Those who come from very traditional backgrounds and receive little formal schooling can, under the right circumstances, still become modern in adult life. The presence of other generalized non-cercopithecids of from sites far distant— from cave deposits in Namibia, and and from France, Spain and Austria—is evidence of a wide diversity of forms across Africa and the Mediterranean basin during the relatively warm and equable climatic regimes of the Early and Middle Miocene. A drawback is that the birth canal of bipedal apes is smaller than in knuckle-walking apes, though there has been a widening of it in comparison to that of australopithecine and modern humans, permitting the passage of newborns due to the increase in cranial size but this is limited to the upper portion, since further increase can hinder normal bipedal movement.
