The survey, housing the revised scales and items presented in Table , was distributed via an established and nationally representative consumer panel, ensuring a balanced sample across demographic criteria such as age, gender and education level. The hypothesised negative relationship between nationalism and charitable cosmopolitanism was not supported by the data in a statistically significant way. Previous research has found that whilst nationalism results in increased consumer ethnocentrism, consumer animosity and perceptions of intergroup differentiation, the reverse was the case for internationalism Lee et al.

When the trust has charitable purposes, and is a charity, the trust is known as a charitable trust. When selecting charities to support, those displaying high charitable cosmopolitanism place greater emphasis on severity of need than the geographical location or nationality of beneficiaries, and may actively search out charities that assist less economically developed countries. Classifying charities as either domestic or international is a common binary used by donors when distinguishing between causes Breeze ; Cheung and Chan.
