Open for business: China's financial liberalization

It appears the reform is intended mainly to revitalize the aging party-state system. Xi is not content to add 4 trillion to 5 trillion yuan of GDP a year. He said the reform will, among many other things, optimize the functions of the party and the state agencies, which includes consolidating existing government departments and agencies, and improving the efficiency and effectiveness of the overall state decision-making process.

China must address institutional reform to sustain high quality growth

The members of each committee usually consist of the heads of the related party and state organs. Cherrie Jihua Zhu is Associate Professor and
