Irish Americans, Irish Nationalism, and the Question, 1916

He is one of six children born to Thomas and Mary Sparrow Downes natives of England, who were brought as small children from that country to the United States by their respective parents in a sailing vessel in 1833, and in the absence of other transportation, they traveled from New York City to their Oneida County homes by way of the Erie Canal. You, sir, are too well acquainted with every family and almost every individual in this county not to have been perfectly aware that this man had personally insulted one half of the young men in it ; and though always reduced to the necessity of making the most abject and submissive apologies, not having hitherto met with any gentleman whose age furnished him with a pretext to consign him to degradation or a premature tomb ; yet that the danger arising to society from the intercourse of such a man was not of a nature so inconsiderable as to warrant you in discharging him without an observance even of common forms. Albany, State University of New York Press.
