Furthermore, in order to increase public interest and participation, countrywide calls for songs—of which outcomes were discussed above—as well as a call for lyrics were announced throughout the 1960s. Literature scholar Youngju Ryu describes the nature of the campaign aptly: Thus, when Korean citizens got up at the crack of dawn and began their day by sweeping the sidewalk to the beat of a Saemaul song playing over the neighborhood public address system, a song whose words were written by none other than President Park himself, they were not simply keeping their communal environment neat. Finally, it should be noted that significant research has been done on the political and economic dimensions of the Park era. See Victor Cha, The Impossible State: North Korea, Past and Future New York: Ecco, 2012. Winning the trust of the US was especially important for him because the US was disapproving of his military coup; moreover, the conservatives of both the US and South Korea suspected that he was sympathetic to communism.
