What Is Epistemology? Pt. 3: The Nature of Justification and Belief

Accessibility internalism, for example, seems to be strongly related to mentalism. Reliability of that sort as applied to process M will suffice for the belief to be justified.

Externalism

Foundationalism requires that nonbasically justified beliefs stand in some suitable logical or probabilistic relations to basic beliefs; coherentism requires that one's system of beliefs be logically consistent, probabilistically coherent, or the like. It hardly follows that the cognizer can be reflectively aware of these justifiers at any time she cares to try, and it is this sort of accessibility that internalism requires. Fumerton, however, claims that there are still merits in epistemic internalism which do not endorse representationalism.

Millikan claims that improperly caused thoughts may feel the same as genuine thoughts, but have no place in this system. Nothing in the internalist picture should rule this out.

What Is Epistemology? Pt. 3: The Nature of Justification and Belief

I have a feeling and it turns out to be true they can justify a false presence if all that matters is the truth of the outcome.

Sanford C. Goldberg (ed.), Internalism and Externalism in Semantics and Epistemology

Internalism and externalism in epistemology,doi: The Problems of Philosophy Oxford: The externalism of whether a belief revision results from following rules seems to involve the notion of the causal explanation of that revision. Internalism in the first instance is a thesis about the basis of either knowledge or justified belief. It goes against the traditional ideational view that meaning should be founded on a subject's ideas.
