Gaius Julius Caesar: Commentarii de bello Gallico

Caesar, however, had been reinforced by two more legions from Gaul the eighth and the twelfth and twenty-two cohorts of recruits recruited by Curio and in fact outnumbered Donitius five to three. No reply did the Sequani make, but silently continued in the same sadness. The three most vulnerable camps were those commanded by Quintus Cicero, Labienus and Sabinus.

In fact, as a testimony to the refined degree of Gallic craftsmanship, many of the equipment was actually adopted by the Romans themselves. There was also the problem of who would fill the gap left behind by the migration — the Romans certainly didn't want a Germanic tribe to move into the newly empty space - there would have been nothing to stop Ariovistus expanding his kingdom south into Switzerland. For example, Caesar writes that robberies committed outside of the state are legalized in hopes of teaching young people discipline and caution, an idea nearly offensive to the judicial practices of the Romans ea iuventutis exercendae ac desidia minuéndae causa fieri praedicant, 6.

Caesar's Civil War

Belgae Caesar described the Belgae as being the most warlike inhabitants of Gaul, partly because they were furthest from the corrupting influences of civilisation and partly because they were constantly at war with their German neighbours.

Caesar's problems in Rome were resolved just in time, for in March it became clear that the Helvetii were about to begin their migration. Eventually seven legions were involved in the campaign, but the Gauls continued to elude the Romans until eventually Correus was killed while attempting to ambush a Roman foraging party.

Gallic Wars

That morning a delegation of German leaders came to the Roman camp, apparently to apologise for the clash of the previous day. When the Romans did begin their pursuit the Helvetii surrendered.

The Belgae then camped two miles away from the Roman camp.
