A separate block is carved for every color to be used in the print. After that, the block is inked and a sheet of dampened paper is laid upon it. Since we have come from a background of collecting—beautiful things in general and Japanese woodblock prints in particular—we want to offer a place for kindred spirits to feel understood and inspired by our carefully selected offerings and our educational content.

Which artists produced antique prints close to those of Hokusai? A Japanese Woodblock Print is said to be the work of the designer, but in actuality it is the combined efforts of three separate artisans -- the artist, the woodblock cutter and the printer. The mulberry paper alone can take three months to make. Kiuchi Sogoro Snow at Iwahashi in Shimousa Province.
