The empirical evidence provides a strong confirmation that localized spillovers play an important role in shaping the geographic concentration of industries. The rate of change of industry real wages has a negative impact in construction, positive in mining, and mixed in coal mining.

Modelling a poisson process: Strike frequency in Great Britain

The structure-conduct-performance paradigm which is highly descriptive and provides an overview of the entire field propounded by b. The opportunity structure for discrimination.

Nominal rigidity

The system of simultaneous equations revealed that states with higher proportions of very small business employment do indeed experience higher levels of productivity growth, and Gross State Product growth, while having less wage inflation and lower unemployment rates. Setting aside evidence of continuing discrimination in each of these domains, these historical practices themselves are sufficient to maintain extraordinarily high levels of wealth inequality through the intergenerational transition of advantage the ability to invest in good neighborhoods, good schools, college, housing assistance for adult children, etc.

Empirical investigation of changes in policy uncertainty on stock returns—Evidence from China's market

A long line of research has examined the degree to which discrimination plays a role in shaping contemporary labor market disparities.
