British Army WW1 Medal Records 1914

It should, therefore, be possible to trace details for an individual who served in the First World War from the surviving medal records. On the second instant at one of the clock in the Morning there happened to break out, a sad in deplorable fire, in Pudding Lane, near New Fishstreet, which falling out at that hour of the night, and in a quarter of the town so close built with wooden pitched houses, spread it self so far before day, and with such distraction to the inhabitants and Neighbours, that care was not taken for the timely preventing the usually only give the name of the person and his or her unit. During the late part of the First World War the Army Medal Office began a system of making out an index card for each individual.

Using the London Gazette to Research a WW1 Soldier

Though, not all foreign awards or mentioned in despatches were gazetted. I constantly use this book in my research and it has enabled me to find citations which I could not find by searching the London Gazette. However, details of the appointment of government and other officials, such as justices of the peace, of church and legal appointments and promotions, although frequently seen in the pages of the Gazette, are erratic and far from consistently given.
