The Ryukyuan—American Treaty concluded on July 11, 1854, stipulated that American citizens in the Ryukyus should be treated with courtesy and friendship; Americans were granted the right of free trade and the ability to move freely on the islands without restriction, as well as the right of extraterritoriality but not of consular residence; and that US ships in difficulty should be assisted and treated with courtesy by the Ryukyuan authorities. Having acknowledged that the Ryukyus were now an integral part of Japan even though the islands would not be formally incorporated for six years, they asked the Meiji government to submit notes granting Italian and German vessels and citizens the same rights and privileges included in the former Ryukyuan treaties and extended to the US, France, and Holland. Placed in a politically subordinate position and constantly fearing Western intrusion, Japan understood the importance of granting concessions to the Western powers in return for their tacit approval of its encroachment on the Ryukyus.
