Barbara Winslow, Rebel by Beth Ellis

Over the boy, whip in hand, stood a man dressed in the uniform of a corporal of the 2d Tangiers Regiment, a stout, purple-faced fellow, with scrubby black hair and beard, near-set cunning eyes, a cruel mouth, and over all an air of supreme importance and self-satisfaction.

I have ever heard Captain Protheroe spoken of as passably honest, though perchance not otherwise, and decidedly hard-featured. The sounds of battle which presently arose proved the success of the corporal's manoeuvre. Thereupon he gave a full account of the transaction, up to the time of his escape from the smithy, omitting only out of respect for the Corporal's threats to refer to his interview with that worthy.

Nature was merciful; clinging to the hand of her protectress she sank at last to sleep.

CHAPTER I Barbara Winslow, Rebel

He, himself, had studied the art in many countries, and knew that few swordsmen in England were his equal, yet he found this youth no mean opponent. The country was closely patrolled by those searching every hole and corner for fugitives from Monmouth's army, and a small search party had their headquarters in the village itself.

He died in his master's place as would many another, and the Duke will return again to venge himself upon this bloody King. Well, why should he not, seeing the confidence was given unasked. Two of his men he posted on the main road to Cannington, where a path turned off over the hill to the river, and two more some distance up the stream, that they might watch and follow Sir Rupert should he by chance elect not to visit the Manor House itself.
