Sketches of our life at Sarawak : McDougall, Harriette Bunyon, 1816 or 17

She was a fearless, can-do woman who had several children, lost some of them to cholera and fever, gave orphans a home and set up a school, had to flee from a Chinese insurrection and attacks by pirates, supported other Europeans who came to work and live in Borneo, took an openminded view on indigenous customs she once found herself at a feast in a longhouse where the centrepiece was three severed human heads on a bed of rice! It shows in detail the hardships that Christian missionaries, of whatever faith, went through just trying to survive in early 19th century East Asia.

Patteson, Bishop; Sketches of the Life of. Mission Work among the Indian Tribes in the Forest of Guiana. There were many fluctuations of sympathy and opinion in after years towards Sir James Brooke; but, through evil report and good report, through difficulty and danger, Sarawak has still advanced, and is as worthy of the interest of the best and wisest of mankind as it was in 1847.

Sketches of our life at Sarawak

I dare say, when we first settled at Sarawak, we thought that twenty years would plant Christian communities, and build Christian churches all over the country: but it is as well that we cannot overlook the future; and perhaps, considering the many difficulties which arose from time to time, from the missionaries themselves, and the unsettled country in which they laboured, we ought not to expect more results than have appeared.
