In New York and other large cities, Hopper painted restaurants, motels, gas stations, and railroads. In 1930, this became the first painting to be acquired by the newly established Museum of Modern Art for its permanent collection. Indeed, by providing a minimum of action, stripping away almost any sign of life or mobility, and adding dramatic means of representation with striking lighting schemes in claustrophobic spaces, Hopper suggests something of the psychological inner life of his subjects, leading the way towards.

Edward Hopper: 100 Famous Paintings, Biography, and Quotes

His choices of subject matter - particularly the places he painted - seem to have been somewhat unpredictable, since they were part of his constant battle with the chronic boredom that often stifled his urge to paint. His marriage to Josephine Nivison, an American artist, and also his student helped him to achieve more milestones in his career as it was with her help that six of his Gloucester watercolors were exhibited at the Brooklyn Museum. The move toward abstract painting was already underway; Cubism had begun.
