Adults can help children cope with death by understanding how they process it

By doing so, children have a model for expressing their own feelings. When a significant adult in their life dies, they become very concerned about separation and altered patterns of care. Repetitive questioning about the death process is also common.

Grief

In understanding death, pre-adolescents attempt to understand both the biological AND emotional process of death. Focusing on the happy memories about Grandma and on the good feeling of being together helps people start to feel better. Caught up in relational and practical concerns.

Ways Child Care Providers Can Help Children Deal with Grief and Loss

Young children may also worry that they will be left alone, especially by the death of a significant adult.

Helping Children Understand Death and Cope with Grief

This is one of the things that emphasizes our individuality. Joey serves Coast Hills Community Church in the spiritual formation department and lives in San Clemente, California. She decides to have a service for her tree so that friends and family can share their special tree memories.
