In many regards, one can see the threads of Dada revived, for example, during the Pop Art era, when repurposed motifs and cultural commentaries emerging from the studios of artists such as Andy Warhol resonated with a hint of Dadaist intrigue. Another Dada group was formed in Cologne in 1918 by and Johannes Theodor Baargeld. By the release of their third album in 1996, I.

Dada (band)

Picabia's travels helped tie New York, Zürich and Paris groups together during the Dadaist period. Each group varied slightly in their focus, with the Berlin group being the most anti-government and the New York group being the most anti-art.

In that year, Ernst left Cologne for Paris, thus dissolving that group. Zurich, in particular, was a hub for people in exile, and it was here that Hugo Ball and Emmy Hemmings opened the Cabaret Voltaire on 5 February 1916. Duchamp served as a critical interlocutor, bringing the notion of anti-art to the group where it took a decidedly mechanistic turn.
