The pedestal, nearly 50 inches in circumference, is of hammered silver, and is made to represent a rocky piece of ground. This piece was made during the peak years of the Guild's production of silverwares, around 1900-1; production dropped with the move to Chipping Campden in 1902 and picked up again in 1903.

He returned to Adelaide in 1887 after the failure of several Australian banks that he had invested in, and stayed a further two years and then returned again back to Germany where he died on 24th July 1914. A flock of sheep in another part are shown feeding quietly, and on the top of a large rock are grouped three natives, one in the act of cooeying, and the other poisoning a spear, while a lubra is seated on the ground with a dead snake.
