Creating the Image of a Martyr: John Porter, Bible Reader on JSTOR

The Emperor answered that undoubtedly the Admiral is on his journey and will be here within three or four days; and, smiling, said he could not tell how the French king used the Protestants or what the Protestants reported, but the French king had signified that the Protestants had so wrought with Henry that he trusted to get a good bargain, and if so would take it; whereunto the Emperor had answered that if the French king had two strings to his bow he might use which he listed,—all the Emperor desired was a peace, and the Admiral came with power to treat of peace and truce, as he thought Gardiner did, and he himself would do his best for either.
