Memoirs of Montparnasse

John Glassco's Memoirs of Montparnasse is a delightfully delicious romp through a few short years of decadence and debauchery, written in a witty, off-hand manner that is refreshingly candid and often quite thought One can be forgiven for writing memoirs at the age of twenty-one if the period covered was Paris in the 1920s and one was hob-nobbing with the likes of Ernest Hemingway, Gertrude Stein, James Joyce, Lord Alfred Douglas, Man Ray, the legendary Kiki, and the ubiquitous Peggy Guggenheim. For those of lesser faiths, he tended bar at one of the Paris expatriates' favorite watering holes, the Dingo. The two books are remarkably similar.

A picture of unalloyed bliss serves Glassco as a reinforcement of the decision to choose Paris. This page shows Glassco gleaned anecdotal information, little of it used in the final text, from Richard Ellmann's biography of Joyce 1959.

Memoirs of Montparnasse

It's like a bad novel. The introduction by Papa Hemingway is fun - apparently Kiki's memoir is the only book to which he agreed to write the introduction.

One wonders whether the luring Hector MacSween MOM, 96-97; 105-06; 233-23 , clearly a fictional creation, is Glassco's revenge on his victorious rival.

Gertrude Stein was dismissive of him and some of his description of her may reflect some of his annoyance.

Louis: Books

By January 29, 1964, he had reached p. It could well be argued that Glassco's work is no more subjective and narrowly focused than the memoirs of Callaghan and Hemingway. He also wrote a number of pornographic works, under various pseudonyms, and completed Aubrey Beardsley's unfinished erotic novel Under the Hill.
