The Queen Victoria Memorial

This time, though, the reflection was seen through black. The palace complex is regularly used for official royal and government functions.

St James's Palace

The palace increased in importance during the reigns of the early monarchy, but was displaced by in the late 18th and early 19th centuries. The roots of its history, however, stretch back much further and continue to still grow today; it remains a popular choice for royal christenings as much now as did then, with the most recent being that of Prince George of Cambridge, in 2013. She would have preferred a simple and private ceremony and greatly disliked the public nature of what was in fact, a small Chapel for such an important royal event.

The most recognisable feature is the north gatehouse; constructed with four storeys, the gatehouse has two flanking octagonal towers at its corners, and a central clock dominating the uppermost floor and gable; the clock is a later addition and dates from 1731. The Tudor palace was regarded as uncomfortable and also as not affording its residents enough privacy, or the space to withdraw from the court into family life.
