James Clinton (soldier)

He took young Henry with him, having failed to acquire a lieutenant's commission for the 12-year-old. Clinton's first military commission was to an independent company in New York in 1745. Howe rejected this advice, and Clinton sailed for Newport in early December, occupying it in the face of minimal opposition.

Their relations were quickly strained, leading Howe to send Clinton on separate missions, starting with an expedition to the south with a fleet under Commodore. Still, he held the confidence of King and Cabinet throughout his service in America. Prior to his return to America in 1775, Clinton had seen action as a senior officer in Germany in the 1760s, serving as aide de camp to the Prince of Brunswick from 1760-62.

The Battle for New York. Congress replied by insisting for American independence to be recognised or all British forces to withdraw first from the states, terms that the commission was not authorised to accept. Clinton was a talented officer and rose rapidly through the ranks by purchasing further commissions.
