The poem ends with a Grahamian speculation on the nature of identity that sounds as well the erotic note of Whitman talking to his readers through the ages: Here. Childhood, once vast with terrors and surprises, Is fading to a landscape deep with distance — And always the sad piano in the distance, Faintly, in the distance, a ghostly tinkling O indecipherable blurred harmonies Or some far horn repeating over water Its high lost note, cut loose from all harmonies. The Scots language recognizes this in five seasons: Lent, Simmer, Hairst, the Back-End, Winter.
