The tour route begins in the Crypt, weaves through the Old Supreme Court Chamber, and then visits the venerated Rotunda, with its impressive paintings of early American history and larger-than-life statues of larger-than-life leaders such as Reagan, Lincoln, King Jr. The current grounds were designed by noted American, who planned the expansion and landscaping performed from 1874 to 1892.

The revised plan was accepted, except that and insisted on an open in the center of the East front, which was part of Thornton's original plan. On December 9, 1869, when most senators had no other office space but their desk in the Chamber, the Senate adopted a rule directing its sergeant at arms to clear the floor of visitors minutes before going into session. Several auxiliary flagpoles, to the west of the dome and not visible from the ground, are used to meet congressional requests for flags flown over the Capitol.

The final scenes depicted in the fresco had not yet occurred when Brumidi began his Frieze of the United States History. February 7, 1870 In 1870, a New York Times reporter looked down from the Senate press gallery to offer his readers word-portraits of several dozen notable senators. Additional light was provided by a large brass chandelier made by Cornelius and Company, a prestigious Philadelphia firm, similar to the one now hanging above the Vice President's desk.
