On October 4, 1871, English builder and undertaker William Robert Loosley had an experience that not only would he never speak of, but his written account of it wouldn't be discovered for over a hundred years when Loosley's great-great-granddaughter discovered it locked away in his hidden desk drawer. It took some time, but eventually he found what he thought he was looking for when he poked 'something metallic' with his walking stick. His first job was as a weapons at the at , from 1975 to 1980.
