CHINESE

Mazdaism was one of the foreign religions proscribed in 845, but there are a few references to Zoroastrian temples as late as the 12th century. She has been in a relationship with Chen for 10 years. There is, however, a much more likely candidate for the author of this memorial, namely, Fa-lin of the Chih-hsiang ssu, a temple very close to the site of Hsin-hsing's memorial stele.

Moreover, the longstanding political raison d'être for the literatus had been his official status as a moral paragon who made his classical degree, earned by examination, relevant to his bureaucratic position. Vaiśeṣikas more commonly list nine, rather than ten, padārthas. The fact that in their on-site study of Chinese temples, steles, and other Buddhist artifacts, Tokiwa Daijō and Sekino Tadashi have recorded the stele under the Pai-t'a ssu of Chung-nan shan in Ch'ang-an prefecture must be dismissed as a mistake, generated by following the opinions of Yabuki and Kanda too closely.

In the process, policy questions on the third session of the provincial and metropolitan examinations virtually ceased to include natural studies. The earliest mention of a memorial for Hsin-hsing is found in his biography in the Hsü kao seng chuan, compiled approximately eighty years after Hsin-hsing's death.

What was now needed was a revamped civil examination that would test more challenging knowledge than poetry or prose writing. Feng also called for widening the selection process for officials to include recommendation and the promotion of clerks who demonstrated their administrative abilities to their superiors. Consisting of 8 divisions with 43 chapters, it is a commentary on the Jñānaprasthāna cf.
