Cesare Lombroso & The Origins of Modern Criminology

In the mid-20th century, won considerable support for his theory that criminal behaviour was more common among muscular, athletic persons than among tall, thin persons or soft, rounded individuals. While their left arm was attached to the machine and the right to an induction coil called a Ruhmkorff, subjects would be exposed to various stimuli — both unpleasant, such as electric shocks and the sound of the firing of a pistol, and pleasant, for example music, food, money, or a picture of a nude woman.
