The regulations were revised again in 1995, mostly to provide for increased First Nation participation. Favel stressed that the lawsuit is not being directed against the oil-and-gas companies. Wallace Fox, chief of the Onion Lake First Nation, says he has expressed his concerns over the years about oil-and-gas wells that should have been bringing money into his community, but they have been ignored.

By 1956, the pipeline is expanded and extended to Samia, Ontario, and is transporting more than 200,000 barrels a day. While not all landowners in Canada own the oil and gas beneath their property, the rights to the resources that sit below reserves are held by First Nations and are overseen by the federal government.
