Roberts, Tom 1856

Little fellow-feeling softens his vision of the all-male madness of pugilism, though the painter delighted in it all the same. . Roberts, who worked part-time arranging background for portrait photographs, and was up with current European ideas about portraiture, would have arranged this cramped corner of the studio with attributes appropriate to his sitter: a green umbrella for outdoor painting, outdoor sketches some of them on cigar box lids supplied by Abrahams who was a cigar manufacturer and merchant and, gesticulating for our attention, the study of a man wearing a short cloak or spacious jacket, waving wildly with both arms. He painted in oil when he could, but the expense - he like to pile on the paint thickly - forced him into often using watercolours in the 1930s.
