Thus in A v United Kingdom, the Court dismissed a claim that a derogation lodged by the British government in response to the was invalid, but went on to find that measures taken by the United Kingdom under that derogation were disproportionate. The Court has defended this on the grounds that the article was intended to apply only to different-sex marriage, and that a wide margin of appreciation must be granted to parties in this area.

European Convention on Human Rights

Judgments finding violations are binding on the countries concerned. Protocol 12 extends this prohibition to cover discrimination in any legal right, even when that legal right is not protected under the Convention, so long as it is provided for in national law.
