The leftover inventory was sold in Canada and in the UK and some of the tooling was reused for products in other markets. Key competitors to Bassett-Lowke were Hornby and Exley, although Bassett Lowke carried Exley products sometimes made by Beeson in their catalogues. Most of the history of the rise and fall of Bassett Lowke is covered in The Bassett Lowke Story by Roland Fuller - with additional material by Dudley Dimmock - New Cavendish Books 1984. However this book concentrates on the model railway aspects of the company's business and does not cover in any depth all its many other model activities.

New Railway Modellers

A review of the locomotive and the Locomotive. According to the catalogues, brass was the material used for the super-structures except for the steam locos in larger scales. Although they traded from 1972 to 1992 and kept a huge following they did little new manufacture beyond new liveries and numbering for the models they made plus the introduction of Royal Scot and a Merchant Navy class locomotives.

Model Railway Firms: Hornby Dublo Rovex Bassett

It seems that the American Pittman motors were distributed in the UK primarily through the Pritchard Patent Product Co Ltd, and the picture below is an extract from a descriptive leaflet on which that firm are stated to be the 'sole sales concessionaires for the British Isles'. The wheels on this particular example like the one above are not LMC ones.

The gauge adopted was 16.

Other Vintage Locos & Motors

In 1963 Pittman released their legendary DC196 in 1963. This loco is at present being restored and painted, and will be named Camelot.

Tri

Bassett Lowke himself had failed to put in place a succession plan and once he became ill and died , the company really lost its way and failed to innovate.
