Flathead River

Most recently, Phil is the GIS database manager for the Crown Manager's Partnership and coordinates the Aquatic Invasive Species sampling efforts for FLBS.

Flathead River

The threat of mussel infestation hits especially close to home for those working to protect the waters of Flathead Lake and its surrounding network of rivers and creeks, and it comes to rest at the doorstep of the Columbia River Basin — the only major watershed in the West still believed to be free of quagga and zebra mussels. He moved on to the Northwest Power and Conservation Council where for 9 years he served as a policy analyst on hydro operations and fish mitigation. Of note he has collaborated on the Biocomplexity Project on the Nyack Floodplain, Montana; the Snake River Project on the Middle Fork of the Snake River, Idaho, and the Reaches Project on the Yakima River, Washington.

The Flathead Watershed

Chris joined the National Park Service as Glacier National Park's Aquatic and Physical Science Programs Manager in 2008. Phil also collects and analyzes aerial photos; coordinates data collection and maintenance of the RiverNet and LakeNet networks; and collects physical, chemical, and biological data as part of the long-term Flathead Lake Monitoring Project and Whitefish Lake Monitoring Projects. Flathead National Forest

The river serves as the headwaters of the Columbia River and is the largest tributary of the Clark Fork River. This has been the subject of 33 years of dispute between the United States and Canada.
