Role of Department Chairs

Between 1990 and 2004, universities and colleges will compete fiercely for 335,000 new faculty members. Here are some of the roles generally expected of a department chair:A department chair is charged with looking at the big picture: looking at the department as a whole and at the department's relationship to the college.

Manuals and Handbooks

A faculty member's comments are protected even though they may be highly critical in tone or content or erroneous, but such statements are not protected free speech if they either substantially impede the faculty member's performance of his or her daily duties, or materially and substantially interfere with the regular operation of the institution, or if they are part of the continuing pattern of expression of such nature as to destroy the harmony and morale of a division, department or college. Please refer to the current undergraduate and graduate catalogs, Faculty Handbook, Faculty Contract or the appropriate handbooks from Human Resources for more information.

Faculty Handbook

Role model Colleagues will look to you as a model, and they will see what you're doing-in all kinds of ways.

The Academic Chairperson's Handbook by John W. Creswell

Each faculty member is entitled to full freedom in the classroom in discussing the subject, which he or she teaches but is expected not to introduce into his or her teachings controversial matters, which have no relation to the classroom subject. Faculty should consult with their department chairs regarding award opportunities; they may also consult with the Office of Sponsored Programs and with the Dean of Research about these and other opportunities.
