Nurses consult nursing and biomedical journals and must search both nursing and biomedical databases to cover the literature. Concerns about recruitment practices, which were expressed by many industry executives and FENs, reveal the need for accountability within the industry. A large percentage of these nurses require additional language and professional education.

The Georgia Nursing Leadership Coalition developed a survey to understand the perspectives of nurses pursuing doctoral degrees in Georgia to improve recruitment and retention strategies. The presence of nurse empowerment, meaning, impact, competence and self-determination, also lowered job stress and increased job satisfaction. We found that the first step toward this goal must be an institutional commitment based on increased awareness and on special effort focused on housestaff recruitment.

As the database grows in size, state, regional, and national results can be compared, trends may be discovered and best practices identified. We hypothesized that students would have a higher enrollment rate and are more cost-effective compared to nurses. Many preceptors indicated they felt pressured into recording assessments they were uncomfortable with.

The New Horizons program included a paid internship for new graduate vocational nurses, a mental health curriculum, preceptorship, a state board review course, and a new graduate program. An awareness of the issues surrounding the recruitment of stroke patients may help researchers in designing and conducting trials. Furthermore, the authors analyze how various stakeholders influence migratory patterns, the implications of migration for nurses and the public in their care, and the challenges that future social policy and political systems face in addressing global health issues engendered by unfettered recruitment of nurses and other health workers.
