Later that year Holland admitted to Lansdowne: I wish that something could be done to turn his talents and good qualities which without neutrality are not inconsiderable to some object useful to his friends and profitable to himself, as he has nothing to do and not quite enough to live comfortably. His majesty's message expressly declared that they were now come to such a form of government. He agreed to submit any plan for withdrawing the army from the control of the crown, through the commander-in-chief, to the king's approval Life of Sidmouth, ii.
