At the 1912 Irish Trades Union Congress, held in Clonmel, it was Connolly who successfully moved the motion for independent labour representation that marked the birth of the Irish Labour Party. We aim to speak out on how political events affect women and children. The proclamation is a straightforward statement of nationalist, not socialist ideas.

1916 in Ireland

Were they all as sound and fury, signifying nothing? The conference thought that the oppression of the Irish working class and in particular women can be ended by that working class using their economic and political strength. Throughout that Easter weekend, with the decision to call off or go ahead with the Rising being debated, Connolly was one of the strongest voices in favour of carrying on with the Rising.

It was formed by , and on 23 November 1913. Perhaps it is no coincidence that the flag of the Irish Citizens Army is being restored to an honoured place at the National Museum at a time when we are reassessing the values that define modern Irish society; invited once again to a critical consciousness when we are struggling to recover from the social costs of an economic model based on extreme individualism, driven by an acquisitive greed located in a property bubble and seduced by a false version of growth that delivered calamitous consequences. It is also important that their interpretation be accessible and made engaging to visitors from home and abroad.

What could not Labour accomplish with an army trained and disciplined by officers who held the affection and confidence of the workers! The blame for Ireland's ills seems to rest with republicans rather than British imperialism. In issue after issue of Workers Republic Connolly appealed to the rank and file of the Volunteers over the heads of the leadership, arguing that were the War to end before a rising could take place, Ireland would have lost a great opportunity to further its aim of independence. That's simply acting as an apologist for imperialism.

History Ireland

A BLOODY WEEKEND At one of the huge nightly rallies in Beresford Place, Larkin announced a public meeting to be held the following Sunday in O'Connell Street in support of the strikers. I can see no benefit to the IRA in a random killing of a mother of 10. It is believed that some of the soldiers involved in Ballymurphy went on to Derry some months later where similar events occurred on Bloody Sunday.

The Irish Citizen Army : Labour clenches its fist! It is also claimed by Irish republicans, and has been carried alongside the and Irish provincial flags at , , INLA , IPLO and rallies and marches. This was Irish republicanism at its most militant period, it was simultaneously a period when Irish workers were at their most militant.
