All of the items start with a short scenario like the one below. After reading the scenario, click on the button next to either the word "Yes" or the word "No" to indicated your response. Then you will type an answer to the question that is posed.

After a televised debate on capital punishment, viewers were encouraged to log on to the station's web site and vote online to indicate if they were "for" or "opposed to" capital punishment. Within the first hour, almost 1000 people "voted" at the website, with close to half voting for each position. The news anchor for this station announced the results the next day. He concluded that the people in this state were evenly divided on the issue of capital punishment.

Given these data, do you agree with the announcer's conclusion?

Yes: No

Provide two suggestions for improving this study.

Sample student constructed response:

It would be better if the researchers picked out people at random that had voted and made sure people can only vote one time.

People could vote a whole bunch of times and no one would know it so that is not accurate.
