1.5 Homeostasis

Main article: The consists of the body's and cells, which together form the , and which in turn form the and related structures. To the account now given may be added, that as the fibres are shorter in proportion as they are more internal, so do they appear narrower, more cylindrical, solid, and intimately united to each other, as we trace the structure inwards.

Chapter 1: Introduction

Also features excellent illustrations and a straightforward organization.

Comparative Method Revisited

This is attached in front to the tarsal cartilages, and is prolonged backwards over the globe and optic nerve, after being perforated by the muscles. To a membrane stretched over a vessel, as in fig.
