Quotations from George Bernard Shaw [1856

It is rather amusing to observe that ultra-Protestants, in proving that Roman Catholicism is pagan and phallic, which they do quite irrefutably, need merely to be confronted with the proof of the Catholics that every point of their religion is derived from Scripture, to form the premisses of a syllogism, whose conclusion is that Christianity is but an adaptation of Phallicism. Shaw will doubtless reply that this merely shows the stupidity of the apostles; but that is no answer to the question as to whether miracles would or would not discredit any given teaching. We are all dependent on one another, every soul of us on earth.

Recognizing herself, Raina chides Saranoff for telling such a crass story in front of her, and he immediately apologizes and reverts to his gallant pose. Here then is the pitfall in which Mr.

George Bernard Shaw, The Perfect Music Critic

Let his habitations turn our cities into poisonous congeries of slums. All were meant to help free the human spirit in its striving toward the creation of a better and more intelligent person, the creation of a superman, the creation, finally, of a God. I stood amazed at the malice and destructiveness of the things I had made.
