Global Education

Published on a biennial basis since the year 2000, this is the 10th report published by the International Organization for Migration. And finally, the author stresses the importance of involving immigrants in the planning process in meaningful, not just symbolic, ways.

While early studies found that schooling levels were poor predictors of economic growth, more recent studies — that crucially made use of better data — confirm the expected positive link. Data on the production of education shows that schooling tends to be largely financed with public resources across the globe, although a great deal of heterogeneity is observed between countries and world regions.

International Perspectives on Home Education

Such distribution of private household contributions to education is regressive. Another approach, which is only in the planning stages, would open channels of regular mobility to refugees, including labor migration, family reunification with relatives already resettled elsewhere, and international study programs. Likewise, the possibility that refugees could become actors for development is also gaining traction.

International Migration

Despite progress in the long run, however, large inequalities remain, notably between sub-Saharan Africa and the rest of the world. The report explores the economic, political and sociological drivers of discontent and argues that building back better from the COVID-19 pandemic in developing countries will require approaches that simultaneously improve citizens' well-being, promote productive transformation and strengthen social cohesion. In the United States, the adjusted figures would be 81 percent family and 7 percent economic.
