Over almost three decades, The National Interest, founded in 1985 by Irving Kristol and Owen Harries, has displayed a remarkable consistency in its approach to foreign policy. With the decline in the power of religion and religious authorities, people looked for a new way to identify themselves, they found this with their nations. Faced with internal and external resistance to , as well as increased xenophobic , radical demands began to develop among the stateless population of and for their own national home and refuge.
