The peculiar nostalgia for the former Bantustans in South Africa

All harbours, most of the railway network and the tarred road infrastructure, all larger airports, the profitable diamond areas and the national parks were situated in the Police Zone. They have never had any formal political dependence on South Africa and were recognised as sovereign states by the international community from the time they were granted their independence by the UK in the 1960s.

History of South Africa's Bantustans

The Bantustans together comprised only 13 percent of the total land area of South Africa; the remaining 87 percent was to

Southern Africa: is Federation a Road to Liberation? on JSTOR

A tremendous outpouring of documentation and reporting, analysis, opinion, and activism has been devoted to this issue; monitoring by international, Palestinian, and Israeli agencies and organizations has shown the policy of fragmentation's devastating impact on the economy, social networks, the provision of basic services such as healthcare and education, and the prospects for an end to Israel's colonization of the West Bank and Gaza , p.
