Forging Links for Health Research

Taking health issues into account in a participatory approach to planning, design, and management of rainwater harvesting and water storage, as well as considering the full range of water storage options would enable better opportunities for enhancing resilience against climate change in vulnerable populations in sub-Saharan Africa. One such means or approaches was that they made efforts to create puppet governments ,that is governments which they could control and therefore control and exploit their economic resources.

A group of about 100 Consuls were the aristocrats who advised the Emperor who represented the Monarchy. Such network can be linked to a well developed railway and road transport network. This arose out of the system of a Vanguard party developed in those socialist countries.

The Policy Paradox in africa1

In Africa, Asia, and the Commonwealth Caribbean, it has created regional ENHR networks to facilitate work at the national level. A recent work of the World Bank, Voices of the Poor, consistently echoed this message, expanding the meaning of poverty beyond lack of material goods and providing a graphic example of the loss of social solidarity: No one helps, not anyone. Oil deposits exist in Uganda, South Sudan, Kenya and Tanzania.

Emeritus Professor PAI OBANYA

In the health sector, this policy has resulted in long-term support for health research at universities in such countries as Ethiopia, Mozambique, and Tanzania. Results showed that virtual water of all food commodities imported to Tamale and Ouagadougou were 514 and 2105 million m³ yr-1 respectively, out of which 68% and 40% were re-exported to other regions of the country.
